Freasyway is an intelligent social network linking innovation and education, set up by Andrey Humbert and Steven Hori, founding members of a documentary and video industry. "It's the very beginning," Andrey says. "We developed a social network around these people which included an e-learning section. However, we needed more time to build an advanced tool, so we stopped most of our activities in order to focus on developing Freasyway separately. It was a risky choice, but we are very satisfied with the current outcome and future development potential. We started an initial plan and the social network is now serving the purpose of education."

"The dream, the motivation comes from the difficulties that he had during his youth when trying to access education, so if he can share what he has learned with others, that will be a great success. Because the dream is to help others to learn."

standards for e-learning.

"Our current challenge is to drive a business forward, do it in a way that is sustainable, and to be able to help others to learn."

"We are hoping to bring a tool that will really support teachers and trainers in their current role. Our biggest activities is to be able to help others to learn, so we are looking for all kinds of solutions."

"From this, the Freasyway team has managed to create a new tool, so we are looking for all kinds of solutions."
